Camp Grayling History

Camp Grayling was founded in 1913. This occurred when Local lumber baron, Ramus Hanson donated over 13,000 Acres to the state of Michigan for military training. The donation became a national guard training camp as we know today. Camp grayling was used mostly for an infantry training center from the beginning of camp grayling. However, JMTC as we know today was used as a mobilization center before and during World War I, in addition it was also used extensive before and during World War II as well.

Camp Grayling Entrance 1940

As one of the largest National Guard bases there was enough room and space for several groups of infantry to train at once. Infantry men could practice maneuvers while pilots were still flying. Camp Grayling at that time was still big enough that artillery as well as Calvary groups could train and perform safe live fire drills.

Camp Grayling History

Shoot, Move, Communicate! These essential tasks must be accomplished in order to meet the mission. Marksmanship, marching, and messaging have always been at the core of training both present and past. While Soldiers prepared for battle, they would march to the ranges to hone their skills in marksmanship.

1927-1929 - The Grayling Army Airfield was constructed for use by the National Guard Air Squadron of Detroit

1936 - Runways were black topped.

The National Guard has maintained the airfield except during World War II when the Federal Government assumed responsibility.

The airfield is the only land on Camp Grayling owned by the federal government
